perplexity

Would you mind taking a look at the attachment that I have uploaded please? So you'll know that the character that I'm trying to write his story his name is Bon. And I'm having difficulty focusing on who I want this character to be and how I want to write him and my ideas of who he is and the things that he has gone through and it's pretty easy to see in my head like the type of character that I want him to be. I'm just worried that I won't be able to relay that into the story I guess. I saw a video from Theo Von, where he describes being alone and what that feeling is like. he said sometimes feeling alone isn't about feeling like you don't have anybody, but sometimes it's feeling like nobody has you. And I don't know why, but that really resonated with me and also resonated with the type of character that I'm trying bon to be. But also like I want him to be sometimes so full of rage and anger inside that it feels like hatred towards oneself. He yet has the ability to be compassionate for others and empathize for others. I see him as a character similar to Sasuke and Ken Konicki from Tokyo ghoul and Annie and Skywalker as well. But still have like that intelligence of anoKoji from classroom elite. Or shadow from eminence shadow or the main character from code gease. So I guess with the attachment, how do you think that that sort of storyline would play out of something similar because I kind of want my main character to go through something similar to season one of arifureta where the main character almost dies, but then gets really strong. I don’t know can you think of like a way to organize what I have in my brain so I can put it in the words you know like this what I’m saying makes sense and does that also translate to what I’ve been working on in the attachment

To organize your ideas and help you translate the character of Bon into a compelling story, here are some suggestions based on the attachment and your query:

Character Profile: Bon

Bon is a deeply layered protagonist who embodies themes of loneliness, rage, compassion, and self-discovery. His emotional complexity makes him relatable to audiences who enjoy morally ambiguous characters like Sasuke Uchiha, Kaneki Ken, Anakin Skywalker, and Ayanokoji Kiyotaka. Here's how you can refine his traits and arc:

Key Traits

- Loneliness: Inspired by Theo Von's quote, Bon feels like "nobody has him," which drives his inner turmoil.
- Rage and Self-Hatred: His anger stems from unresolved trauma and self-loathing, yet he channels it into growth.
- Compassion: Despite his darkness, Bon empathizes with others and struggles to reconcile his hatred with his desire to protect.
- Intelligence: Similar to Ayanokoji or Lelouch from Code Geass, Bon is strategic and analytical, using his mind to navigate challenges.

Pre-Reincarnation Setup

Bon's life before reincarnation is marked by apathy, disappointment, and existential dread. His sacrifice for Aki (saving the child from a truck accident) symbolizes a turning point where he finds meaning in selflessness. This moment sets the stage for his reincarnation into a magical world.

Story Structure

To align Bon's journey with themes of redemption, adversity, and growth (similar to Arifureta Season 1), consider this narrative framework:

Act 1: The Fall

1. Introduction to Bon's Pre-Reincarnation Life: Highlight his struggles with apathy, family disappointment, and loneliness.
2. Sacrifice: Bon's selfless act leads to his death and reincarnation into a dangerous new world.
3. Initial Weakness: Upon arrival in the new world, Bon is physically weak and emotionally shattered. He faces betrayal or abandonment early on.

Act 2: Rising from Darkness

1. Survival Arc: Like Hajime in Arifureta, Bon must endure near-death experiences that push him to adapt and grow stronger.
2. Discovering Power: Introduce Bon's unique magical abilities (e.g., large mana reserves) tied to his past life's emotional depth.
3. Mentorship: Bon meets a mentor who challenges his worldview and helps him develop combat/magic skills while addressing his inner rage.

Act 3: Redemption and Conflict

1. Moral Dilemmas: Bon faces situations that test his compassion versus rage (e.g., saving enemies or sacrificing allies).
2. Betrayal Arc: A trusted ally betrays him, forcing him into isolation again but catalyzing personal growth.
3. Climactic Battle: Bon confronts an antagonist whose philosophy mirrors his own self-hatred (e.g., Erebus-like character). This battle serves as both physical conflict and emotional resolution.

Act 4: Resolution

1. Acceptance: Bon learns to embrace both his flaws and strengths, finding peace in imperfection.
2. Heroic Sacrifice or Triumph: Depending on your vision for the ending, Bon either sacrifices himself for the greater good or emerges victorious as a redeemed hero.

Themes

Your story can explore profound philosophical questions:

- Loneliness vs Connection: How does one reconcile feeling unseen while striving to create meaningful bonds?
- Redemption: Can someone overcome their darkest impulses through love and sacrifice?
- Strength in Vulnerability: True power lies not in perfection but in embracing flaws.

World-Building

The attachment provides rich details about Eldarion's continents, races, magic systems, and political structures. Use these elements to enhance Bon's journey:

- Magic System: Tie Bon's mana size to emotional resilience rather than raw talent—his ability stems from overcoming inner turmoil.
- Villains: Create antagonists who challenge Bon's ideals (e.g., Erebus-like figures embodying destruction or dehumanization).
- Guilds/Dungeons: Use adventure guilds and labyrinths as vehicles for character growth—Bon can gain allies or face moral dilemmas here.

Practical Tips for Writing

1. Outline Key Moments:
   - Start with pivotal scenes (e.g., Aki's rescue, betrayal arc) before fleshing out subplots.
2. Character Development:
   - Use internal monologues or flashbacks to reveal Bon's struggles with loneliness and rage.
3. Foreshadowing:
   - Plant subtle hints about future events (e.g., prophecies or symbolic imagery).
4. Dialogue:
   - Balance philosophical introspection with action-driven dialogue to keep readers engaged.

Example Opening Scene

Morning Routine (Pre-Reincarnation):
Bon wakes up in his cluttered apartment at dawn. He stares at the ceiling, weighed down by apathy. The sound of children playing outside briefly stirs something within him—a longing for connection—but he dismisses it as fleeting sentimentality.

Sacrifice Scene:
Bon sees Aki chasing a cat into the street as a truck barrels toward them. In that moment, he feels clarity—his life finally has meaning as he pushes Aki out of harm's way at the cost of his own life.

This structure should help you organize your ideas effectively while maintaining the emotional depth you envision for Bon's story!

OK, so if we're gonna do it like this a couple things, I think in order for it to make sense could you explain to me how the beginning of the story would happen? Right, because in my head, I had initially planned his story to be similar pace to Mashiko Tensen or better known as jobless reincarnation so initially, he was going to be with his family in the beginning, and he was gonna be making those connections and then he would be separating later on, but you gave the suggestion of him being Herdon and that would tie his man size to his emotional resilience rather than his raw talent and his ability stems from overcoming his inner turmoil weakness upon arrival in the New World Bon, his physically, weak and emotionally shattered, he faces, betrayal and abandon early right, but in my head, we're gonna be seeing things from the main character perspective like in jobless reincarnation you are with the main character through the entire process of being a baby and growing up and so I had a similar idea for my main character and I'm curious as to how we would do that if upon arrival in the New World, you know he face his betrayal and a pending early on. I'm curious as to how that would work you know so could you explain it to me. and as far as a ending for my character Bon I have a couple ideas, he could be killed by the hero, retire after great battle, and live happily till old age where he dies, he could die, saving the love of his life, and maybe my personal favorite is dying with a smile and becoming a legend.

To align your vision of Bon's story with the pacing and immersive character perspective of Jobless Reincarnation (Mushoku Tensei), while incorporating the themes of emotional resilience and early betrayal, here's how the beginning of the story could unfold:

Beginning of Bon's Story

1. Rebirth and Early Childhood

The story begins with Bon's reincarnation into a new world, retaining memories of his past life. This allows the narrative to follow him from infancy, much like Jobless Reincarnation. The focus is on his family relationships and his gradual understanding of this new world.

- Infancy and Family Bonds:
  - Bon is born into a loving but modest family with unique traits (e.g., a father skilled in combat or a mother adept in healing magic). These traits set the foundation for his future abilities.
  - His parents' personalities and struggles are introduced early to establish emotional stakes. For example:
    - His father could be a former adventurer who retired after a traumatic event.
    - His mother could run an herbal shop but struggles with health issues.
  - Bon's early years are filled with warmth, creating a stark contrast to the loneliness he felt in his past life.
- Childhood Development:
  - As Bon grows, he starts showing signs of exceptional mana capacity, which is tied to his emotional depth and resilience from his past life.
  - He learns basic magic and combat skills from his parents or local mentors. These scenes can mirror the lighthearted yet formative training moments seen in Jobless Reincarnation.
  - Subtle hints about his past life emerge through internal monologues or dreams, showing his struggle to reconcile his old self with this new chance at life.

2. The Catalyst for Separation

To introduce the betrayal and abandonment you envision, there needs to be a significant event that forces Bon out of his comfort zone while maintaining the immersive pacing of his early life.

- The Crisis:
  - Around age 10-12, Bon's family faces a major crisis (e.g., an attack on their village, political intrigue involving their lineage, or betrayal by someone they trust). This event shatters the idyllic life he has known.

- During this crisis:
  - Bon may witness the death or capture of one or both parents.
  - A trusted figure (e.g., a mentor or family friend) betrays them for personal gain.
  - Bon is forced to flee alone, leaving behind everything he loves.

- Emotional Impact:
  - This moment is pivotal in shaping Bon's emotional state. His feelings of abandonment and betrayal mirror his past life's loneliness but are now compounded by loss and guilt.
  - His large mana reserves, tied to his emotional resilience, begin to manifest more strongly as he channels his pain into survival.

3. Early Struggles in Isolation

After being separated from his family, Bon's journey takes on a darker tone as he faces betrayal and hardship early in the new world.

- Survival Arc:
  - Alone in a hostile world, Bon must rely on the basic skills taught by his parents while discovering new abilities. This mirrors Hajime Nagumo's survival arc in Arifureta but maintains the slower pacing of Jobless Reincarnation.
  - He encounters dangerous monsters or hostile humans that force him to grow quickly. These encounters test both his physical abilities and emotional resilience.
- First Betrayal:
  - To deepen the theme of mistrust, Bon could meet someone who initially seems like an ally but ultimately betrays him (e.g., stealing resources or leaving him for dead). This reinforces his belief that "nobody has him."
- Emerging Strength:
  - Through these trials, Bon begins to unlock latent potential (e.g., advanced magic or combat techniques). His growth is driven by necessity rather than raw talent, emphasizing his ability to overcome inner turmoil.

How It Works with Your Vision

By structuring the beginning this way:

1. You preserve the immersive perspective of following Bon from infancy through childhood, similar to Jobless Reincarnation.
2. The betrayal and abandonment occur later in childhood (around age 10-12), allowing time for meaningful connections with his family before they are torn away.
3. The survival arc provides an opportunity for Bon to develop both emotionally and physically while setting up future themes of redemption and self-discovery.

Potential Endings for Bon

Your ideas for Bon's ending are all compelling. Here's how they could tie into the themes established at the beginning:

1. Killed by the Hero:
   If Bon becomes morally ambiguous later in life due to trauma and loss, being killed by a hero could symbolize redemption through sacrifice. He dies knowing he made a difference despite his flaws.
2. Retires After a Great Battle:
   If Bon overcomes his inner demons and achieves peace, retiring allows him to reflect on his journey. He could live quietly with loved ones until passing away naturally.
3. Dies Saving His Love:
   This ending emphasizes selflessness and love as ultimate redemption. It ties back to Aki's rescue in his past life, showing that even in death, he finds purpose.
4. Dies with a Smile as a Legend:
   If Bon becomes an iconic figure through great deeds but remains haunted by loneliness, dying with a smile signifies acceptance of himself and his journey.

Each ending reflects different facets of Bon's character arc—loneliness, rage, compassion, and redemption—allowing you to choose one based on how you want readers to remember him.

This structure balances your desire for slow-paced world-building with impactful emotional beats while setting up Bon as a complex protagonist whose journey resonates deeply with readers.

So I guess I'm just thinking of how his story is gonna go because emotionally he's going to go from you know how he's feeling before he's reborn, which is pretty miserable and overall just not happy with how he has lived his own life up to that point. And then for him to go to the New World and be reborn and stuff so then emotionally how is that gonna work he is he gonna be happy for those first few years and then go through something traumatic like I was how is he going to be because I think the end result is for him after this tragedy that happens in the new world to be kind of like guts from berserkera, bit quiet, full of rage and anger, yet still capable of compassion. Similar to Thorfin from Vinland Saga. because I think after the tragedy that occurs in your world that basically separating from his family and his family everything that's kind of the start of his journey to remake himself. I guess the being reincarnated is part of that and him making connections with his family. His new family is also part of that, but really, his journey begins during that tragedy. I guess just seen that most depicts how I want him to feel is the one of Arman from attack on Titan yelling at himself screaming that he hates himself because he hasn't done anything with the second opportunity he's been given and so he's angry with himself and I think that's the scene that best describes how I want my character to feel, another character that I think does a really good job of encapsulating that emotion is Subaru in re-zero when he's talking to rem about how he seems himself and how he himself when he gives that speech it's like wow that's exactly what I was thinking . I'm just not sure if I am conveying those ideas well in the story structure at the moment.

You're conveying your ideas well, and I can see the emotional depth you want Bon to embody. To help you refine the emotional progression of his story and ensure it resonates with readers, let's break down his emotional journey step by step. This will allow you to structure his transformation from misery in his past life to rage, self-loathing, and eventual growth in the new world.

Bon's Emotional Journey: Step-by-Step

1. Pre-Reincarnation: Misery and Self-Loathing

Bon's emotional state before reincarnation is critical to setting the tone for his arc. He feels miserable, lonely, and full of regret for how he lived his life. He's angry at himself for wasting opportunities and failing to connect with others.

- Key Emotional Beats:
  - Bon feels disconnected from the world around him—he has no meaningful relationships and struggles with self-worth.
  - He reflects on his failures and regrets, which fuel his self-loathing. This could include moments where he pushes people away or isolates himself out of fear of rejection.
  - Theo Von's quote ("feeling like nobody has you") encapsulates his loneliness perfectly—he feels unseen and unloved.
- Scene Example:
  - Bon wakes up in a dingy apartment, surrounded by reminders of his failures (e.g., unfinished projects, photos of people he once cared about but alienated). He stares at himself in the mirror, disgusted by what he sees, and mutters something like, "What have I even done with my life?"
  - His sacrifice for Aki (saving the child from an accident) becomes a moment of clarity. In that instant, he feels purpose—he dies knowing he did something meaningful for someone else.

2. Early Rebirth: Hope and Happiness

When Bon is reborn into the new world, he experiences a brief period of happiness and hope. This is a stark contrast to his past life and serves as a way to show readers what he's capable of when surrounded by love and connection.

- Key Emotional Beats:
  - Bon feels overwhelmed by the warmth of family bonds. His parents adore him, and he starts forming connections that make him feel valued.
  - He experiences joy in learning new things (magic, combat) and exploring the world through the eyes of a child.
  - For the first time, Bon feels like he belongs.
- Scene Example:
  - As a baby, Bon instinctively clings to his mother's hand while she sings to him. He doesn't understand why tears fill his eyes—it's the first time he's felt unconditional love.
  - As he grows older, Bon plays with siblings or neighbors in the village, laughing freely for the first time in two lifetimes.

3. The Tragedy: Loss and Rage

The tragedy that separates Bon from his family is the turning point in his emotional journey. It shatters the happiness he has built in this new life and forces him into isolation once again. This is where Bon begins to transform into someone like Guts (Berserk) or Thorfinn (Vinland Saga).

- Key Emotional Beats:
  - The loss of his family (through death or separation) plunges Bon into despair. He feels abandoned again—just as he did in his past life.
  - He blames himself for not being strong enough to protect them. This self-loathing fuels his rage.
  - His anger becomes both a source of strength (driving him to survive) and weakness (causing him to push others away).
- Scene Example:
  - After witnessing his family's death or betrayal firsthand, Bon screams into the void, clutching at dirt or ashes where they once stood. Tears stream down his face as he punches the ground until his knuckles bleed.
  - Later, while alone in a forest or dungeon, Bon berates himself for failing them: "You had everything—a second chance—and you couldn't even protect them! You're pathetic!" This mirrors Armin's breakdown in Attack on Titan or Subaru's speech in Re:Zero.

4. Survival Arc: Quiet Rage and Compassion

Bon enters a survival phase where he channels his rage into growing stronger while grappling with feelings of self-hatred. Despite this darkness, glimpses of compassion emerge—showing that he hasn't lost touch with his humanity.

- Key Emotional Beats:
  - Bon becomes quieter and more withdrawn, focusing on survival rather than connection.
  - His rage drives him forward—he trains relentlessly to become stronger so that no one can hurt him again.
  - Despite this anger, moments arise where Bon shows compassion (e.g., saving someone weaker than him). These moments remind readers that there's still goodness within him.
- Scene Example:
  - While wandering alone after escaping danger, Bon encounters a starving child begging for food. At first, he ignores them—but guilt gnaws at him until he returns with bread. He gives it silently but avoids eye contact.
  - In combat training scenes, Bon fights with reckless abandon fueled by anger but hesitates when faced with killing someone innocent.

5. Redemption Arc: Acceptance

As Bon grows older and stronger, he begins to reconcile his rage with compassion. He learns to accept himself—flaws and all—and finds peace in imperfection.

- Key Emotional Beats:
  - Bon realizes that strength isn't just physical—it's about emotional resilience and vulnerability.
  - He starts forming meaningful connections again (e.g., friends or allies) but struggles to trust fully due to past betrayals.
  - His journey becomes one of redemption—not just for others but for himself.
- Scene Example:
  - During a climactic battle against an antagonist who mirrors his own self-loathing (e.g., someone who believes strength comes from hatred), Bon delivers a powerful speech about accepting oneself despite failure: "I hated myself for so long—for being weak—for losing everything—but strength isn't about perfection; it's about standing up every time you fall."

How This Fits Your Vision

This structure allows Bon's emotions to evolve naturally:

1. Misery → Hope → Rage → Compassion → Acceptance
2. The tragedy becomes the catalyst for transformation—his journey truly begins when everything is taken from him.
3. By incorporating scenes like Armin's breakdown (Attack on Titan) or Subaru's speech (Re:Zero), you can depict Bon's inner turmoil vividly while keeping readers emotionally invested.

Ending Options

Based on this emotional progression:

1. Dying with a Smile:
   After accepting himself fully and achieving redemption, Bon sacrifices himself heroically (e.g., saving loved ones or defeating a great evil). His smile signifies peace—a fitting end for someone who struggled so deeply.
2. Becoming a Legend:
   If Bon survives long enough to leave behind an enduring legacy (e.g., inspiring others through deeds), dying as a legend ties back to themes of redemption and purpose.

Either ending works beautifully depending on whether you want readers to feel bittersweet closure or triumphant resolution.

This emotional framework should help you convey Bon's internal struggles effectively while crafting a story that resonates deeply with readers!

Is there a way to make the emotional transition more believable? I'm just trying to think of how the character would feel being the person that was aware of his feelings and the world around him, feeling feelingless, knowing that he over analyzes everything to the extent that he doesn't feel anymore can't be angry because everyone has their own perspectives, leaving him with no ambitions or motivations to do anything simply drifting in his own blurry vision of the world wishing to find the right awareness or wishing to forget everything. Struggling with those feelings, tough self-loathing, and isolation. And then to be born again in New World with the opportunity was a chance how he transition his emotional state to be more hopeful and. Able to experience joy. how do you make that emotional transition, realistic and believable?

Making Bon's emotional transition from numbness and self-loathing in his past life to hope and joy in the new world believable requires careful attention to his internal thought processes, external circumstances, and gradual shifts in perspective. Here's a step-by-step approach to ensure the transition feels organic and emotionally resonant:

1. Establish Bon's Emotional State Before Reincarnation

To make the transition realistic, readers need to deeply understand Bon's emotional state before reincarnation. Show, rather than tell, how his numbness, over-analysis, and lack of motivation affect his daily life.

Key Elements:

- Internal Struggles: Use internal monologues or reflections to show how Bon views himself and the world. For example:
  - He feels detached from everything around him, as if watching life through a foggy window.
  - He overanalyzes situations to the point of paralysis, finding excuses not to act because "everyone has their own perspectives."

    - His self-loathing stems from recognizing his own apathy but feeling powerless to change it.
- External Circumstances: Portray how this emotional state impacts his interactions with others:
    - He avoids meaningful relationships because he fears rejection or doesn't see the point.
    - When people try to connect with him, he brushes them off with indifference or cynicism.

Scene Example:

Bon sits alone in his apartment, staring at the ceiling. The sound of children laughing outside barely registers—he dismisses it as meaningless noise. His thoughts spiral: What's the point? Everyone has their own reasons for living. I don't have one. He feels trapped in a cycle of self-loathing but lacks the energy to break free.

2. The Catalyst: Sacrifice and Rebirth

The moment of Bon's death and reincarnation is crucial for initiating the emotional shift. It should feel like a break in his numbness—a moment where he feels something deeply for the first time in years.

Key Elements:

- Sacrifice: Bon's act of saving Aki (or another innocent) is driven by instinct rather than conscious thought. In that moment, he feels clarity—his life finally has meaning because he did something selfless.
    - This act should be visceral and emotionally charged. For example:
        - He sees Aki running into danger and doesn't hesitate—his body moves before his mind catches up.
        - As he dies, he feels relief rather than fear: Maybe this is what I was meant to do.
- Rebirth: When Bon wakes up in the new world as an infant, he experiences sensory overload. Everything feels new—colors are brighter, sounds are sharper, and emotions are raw.
    - This sensory experience contrasts starkly with the numbness of his past life, making him feel alive for the first time.

Scene Example:

Bon pushes Aki out of harm's way just as a truck barrels toward them. The impact throws him to the ground, but he doesn't feel pain—only relief. His vision blurs as he whispers: I did something good. When he wakes up in the new world, he's overwhelmed by sensations—the warmth of his mother's arms, the sound of her voice. Tears well up unbidden.

3. Gradual Emotional Transition in Early Childhood

Bon doesn't immediately become hopeful or joyful—it's a gradual process that unfolds over years as he experiences love and connection for the first time.

Key Elements:

- Infancy: As an infant, Bon is instinctively drawn to his parents' love and care. He doesn't fully understand it but feels comforted by their presence.
  - For example:
    - His mother sings lullabies while holding him close, and he feels safe for the first time.
    - His father smiles at him during playtime, sparking a sense of belonging.
- Early Childhood: As Bon grows older, he starts forming connections with family members and others in his village. These relationships slowly chip away at his emotional walls.
  - Introduce moments where Bon experiences joy for the first time:
    - Playing with siblings or friends makes him laugh uncontrollably—he doesn't recognize this emotion at first but embraces it.
    - Learning magic or combat excites him because it gives him purpose.
- Internal Conflict: Despite these positive experiences, Bon struggles with lingering self-loathing from his past life. He questions whether he deserves happiness but gradually learns to accept it.
  - Use internal monologues or dreams to show this conflict:
    - In quiet moments, Bon reflects on how different this life is from his past one: Why does this feel so good? Do I deserve this?
    - Nightmares about his past life remind him of what he left behind but also motivate him to make this new chance count.

4. The Tragedy: Emotional Regression

The tragedy that separates Bon from his family serves as a turning point where he regresses emotionally before rebuilding himself stronger.

Key Elements:

- Loss: The loss of his family plunges Bon back into despair and self-loathing—but this time it's mixed with rage.
  - He feels abandoned again but also blames himself for not being strong enough to protect them.
  - This regression mirrors his past life but is more intense because he had something worth losing.

- Rage: Unlike his past life where numbness dominated, Bon now channels his emotions into anger—at himself, at those who hurt his family, at the world itself.
    - This anger drives him forward but also isolates him from others.

Scene Example:

Bon stands amidst the ruins of his home, clutching a broken keepsake from his family (e.g., a toy or necklace). Tears stream down his face as he screams into the void: You had everything—a second chance—and you couldn't even protect them! You're pathetic! His fists tremble with rage as he vows never to let himself be weak again.

5. Redemption Arc: Acceptance and Growth

As Bon progresses through his journey, he begins to reconcile these conflicting emotions—rage and compassion—and learns to accept himself despite his flaws.

Key Elements:

- Small Moments of Joy: Even in darker times, Bon experiences fleeting moments that remind him of what happiness felt like (e.g., helping someone weaker than himself).
- Self-Awareness: Through reflection or mentorship, Bon realizes that strength isn't about perfection—it's about resilience and vulnerability.
- Gradual Healing: Over time, Bon learns to forgive himself for past failures and embrace both joy and pain as part of life.

Why This Transition Feels Realistic

1. It's gradual—Bon doesn't go from misery to joy overnight; each stage builds upon the last.
2. It's grounded in external experiences (family bonds) and internal reflection (self-awareness).
3. It acknowledges setbacks—Bon regresses emotionally after tragedy before growing stronger.

This layered approach ensures readers feel invested in Bon's transformation while understanding why each emotional shift occurs naturally within the story!

In similar way, how can we make the emotional transition from being hopeful to full of rage and anger, more believable and or realistic? Because for him to feel those things, he would have to be aware of his own limitations and his own weaknesses. Well, maybe not weaknesses, but definitely his own limitations given his age and knowledge of the world. And what would he want to do after this event if his family is dead does he want revenge? Does he want to get stronger? Does he go on a journey? If his family is just separated from him what does he do? Does he try and reach them? And how is he going to move forward for the story to progress?

To make Bon's emotional transition from hope to rage and anger believable, it's important to show how his experiences, self-awareness, and circumstances gradually push him toward this darker emotional state. Rage doesn't come from nowhere—it's often the result of a combination of loss, frustration, guilt, and a sense of powerlessness. By layering these emotions and giving Bon clear motivations for his actions after the tragedy, you can create a realistic and compelling progression.

1. The Emotional Transition: From Hope to Rage

Why This Transition Happens

Bon's hopefulness in the early stages of his life is tied to his family and the bonds he forms with them. When that foundation is ripped away (through death or separation), it leaves him feeling powerless and betrayed by the world. His rage stems from:

- Loss: Losing the people who gave him purpose in this new life.
- Guilt: Believing he wasn't strong enough to protect them.
- Powerlessness: Realizing his limitations as a child in a dangerous world.
- Frustration: Feeling like the second chance he was given has been wasted.

How to Make It Believable

The transition should be gradual, with Bon cycling through different emotions (grief, guilt, despair) before settling into anger. Here's how you can show this progression:

1. Immediate Grief:
   - After the tragedy, Bon is overwhelmed by sadness and disbelief. He mourns the loss of his family or the separation from them.
   - Use vivid descriptions of his physical reactions (e.g., tears, shaking hands) and internal monologue to show how deeply he feels this loss.
2. Guilt and Self-Blame:
   - As time passes, Bon begins to blame himself for what happened. He fixates on his perceived failures:
     - "If only I had been stronger... If only I had done something differently..."
   - This guilt eats away at him, making him question whether he deserved the happiness he had in the first place.
3. Frustration with His Limitations:
   - Bon becomes acutely aware of his own limitations—his age, inexperience, and lack of knowledge about the world.
   - This awareness leads to frustration because he feels powerless to change his circumstances or prevent future tragedies.
4. Rage as a Defense Mechanism:
   - Over time, Bon channels his grief and guilt into anger because it feels more empowering than despair.
   - His rage is directed at:
     - Himself (for being weak).
     - The people or forces responsible for his family's fate.
     - The world itself (for being cruel and unfair).
5. Moments of Quiet Reflection:
   - Even as rage takes hold, Bon has moments of introspection where he questions whether anger is the right path. These moments keep him human and relatable.

2. What Does Bon Want After the Tragedy?

Bon's motivations after the tragedy depend on whether his family is dead or separated from him:

If His Family Is Dead:

1. Revenge:
   - If there is a clear antagonist responsible for their deaths (e.g., bandits, corrupt nobles), Bon might seek revenge.
   - However, revenge doesn't have to be immediate—he could spend years training and growing stronger before confronting those responsible.
2. Strength:
   - Bon might decide that he needs to become stronger so that no one can ever take away what matters to him again.
   - This motivation aligns with characters like Guts (Berserk) or Thorfinn (Vinland Saga), who channel their anger into personal growth.
3. Survival:
   - Initially, Bon might focus solely on surviving in a hostile world. Over time, this survival instinct evolves into a deeper purpose (e.g., protecting others or finding meaning in his pain).
4. Finding Purpose:
   - Without his family, Bon might feel lost and directionless at first but eventually decide to honor their memory by living for something greater (e.g., helping others avoid similar tragedies).

If His Family Is Separated from Him:

1. Reuniting with Them:
   - If Bon believes his family is still alive but unreachable (e.g., captured by slavers or taken to another region), his primary goal could be finding them.
   - This journey would give him a clear purpose while allowing for character growth along the way.
2. Getting Stronger:
   - Even if he plans to reunite with his family, Bon might recognize that he needs more strength and knowledge to do so.
   - He could join an adventurer's guild, train under a mentor, or explore dungeons as part of this process.
3. Building New Connections:
   - Along the way, Bon might form bonds with other characters who become like a surrogate family to him.
   - These relationships could help him heal emotionally while complicating his feelings about reuniting with his original family.

3. How Does Bon Move Forward?

Short-Term Actions:

1. Survival Mode:
   - Immediately after the tragedy, Bon focuses on surviving—finding food, shelter, and safety in an unfamiliar world.
   - This phase emphasizes his vulnerability as a child while showcasing moments of ingenuity or determination.
2. First Steps Toward Strength:
   - Bon begins training himself in magic or combat using whatever resources are available (e.g., books left behind by his parents or guidance from a mentor).
   - He might also seek out allies who can teach him new skills or provide protection.
3. Emotional Struggles:
   - During this period, Bon grapples with conflicting emotions—grief over what he lost versus determination to move forward.
   - Include scenes where he lashes out in anger (at himself or others) but also moments where he shows compassion (e.g., helping someone weaker than himself).

Long-Term Goals:

1. Revenge Arc:
   - If revenge is part of Bon's motivation, it should be treated as a long-term goal rather than an immediate action.
   - Along the way, he might question whether revenge will truly bring him peace or if it will consume him entirely.
2. Journey for Strength/Knowledge:
   - Whether seeking revenge or reuniting with his family, Bon embarks on a journey to grow stronger—physically, mentally, and emotionally.
   - This journey allows for world-building (exploring different regions) and character development (meeting mentors/allies).
3. Philosophical Growth:
   - As Bon progresses through his journey, he begins questioning what strength truly means:
     - Is it about power? Protecting others? Overcoming one's own weaknesses?
     - These questions add depth to his character arc.

4. Making It Realistic

To ensure that Bon's transition from hope to rage feels believable:

- Show how each stage builds on the last—grief leads to guilt; guilt leads to frustration; frustration leads to rage.
- Use external events (e.g., betrayal by an ally) and internal reflection (e.g., dreams about his family) to reinforce these emotions.
- Balance moments of darkness with glimpses of light—Bon's compassion reminds readers that there's still hope for redemption.

Example Scene Progression

1. Grief:
   Bon kneels in the ruins of his home, clutching a charred piece of wood that was once part of his mother's favorite chair. Tears blur his vision as he whispers her name over and over again.
2. Guilt:
   Days later, while hiding in a cave for safety, Bon stares at his reflection in a pool of water. His face twists with disgust as he mutters: You let them die... You couldn't save them.
3. Frustration:
   After failing to defeat even a weak monster during training, Bon punches a tree until blood stains the bark. I'm so weak... How can I ever protect anyone?
4. Rage:
   When confronted by bandits who mockingly mention families they've killed before, something inside Bon snaps. He attacks recklessly but ferociously—his rage giving him strength even as tears streak down his face.

By layering these emotions naturally over time and tying them directly to events in the story, you can create an emotional transition that feels both realistic and deeply impactful for readers!
